

been engaged to teach at Edinburgh and yielded to the persuasion of my friends and relatives to go you may be assured that I will not regret
it. I have not yet received your kind letter and am sorry to hear that you are
ill. I am glad to hear
that you are well and hope that you will soon be able to visit me.
I am very truly yours
J. G. Thompson

absent, and the action of the meeting reported to her afterwards? Or there might be printed or type-written copies of the self-imposed rules and restrictions of the Association, one provided for each student, because you know such things as rules are very hard to remember, and a new student unaccustomed to discipline would find it rather hard to keep in mind all the various little things that go to make up Bryn Mawr's unwritten law. This may be a needless precaution — remember it is only a suggestion. I am so glad the Dean approves, and glad that the students can take any burden off her shoulders. One of the chief benefits the students will derive from this thing, is, in my eyes, the stimulus given to practical self-government, and self-control. The girls at Bryn Mawr are most of them women, and it is dwarfing to their womanhood's development to be forced to follow in a beaten track, and never to think for themselves. I am glad you thought of this scheme.

I don't know if any one has told you of my decision to give up college this year — Laurette may have mentioned my doubting of it, but I have only positively decided that week. It fairly breaks my heart to stay away, but I feel sure it is the wisest thing to do. My health has been so bad all summer and my one is urging me so to take this year for rest, that I have and coincident one. About the final meeting of all students new and old, there will be a great always is, you know, difficulty in getting every student to come. I don't think the new ones quite appreciate the importance of attending the meeting until they have been there some little time, and if it suits their convenience better to stay away, I have no doubt they will do so.

This ought to be provided against in some way, don't you think?

Couldn't there be a regular roll-call just for that one important meeting, and then any absent student could be marked